Section A: Research Methods

Sociologists who wish to collect qualitative data often use unstructured or informal interviews. This type of interview usually consists of a list of topics the interviewer wishes to discuss. The interviewer will ask a number of open-ended questions which may stimulate discussions or further questions. The interviewer will carry out the interview in a relaxed manner in order to put the interviewee at ease.

This form of interview is said to have greater validity than more formal interviews as it can produce data that has greater depth. However, critics of this approach say that it can lead to interviewer bias. Observation is another approach used by sociologists to collect qualitative data.
